(MONTEREY PARK, CA) – The Vincent Price Art Museum at East Los Angeles College is pleased to present York Chang: The Signal and the Noise, an ambitious solo exhibition by the Los Angeles–based artist. Chang makes conceptually driven work which considers the relationship between images and text, and how collective action is influenced by spectacle and new forms of propaganda. In this project, he employs mixed media strategies as interventions into information systems, appropriating newspapers, graphic displays, found images, and sculpture to create an immersive environment in the exhibition space.

Works in the exhibition take an uneasy, ambivalent position on this present moment, and on the question of whether aesthetics have any critical potential left to resist these conditions, rather than to contribute to it. As the boundaries between entertainment and political spheres collapse in our visual environment, aesthetics in political images can work to desensitize the viewer to the pain and suffering of others or it can overwhelm their sense of agency through distraction and spectacle. But aesthetics in politics can also bring attention to covert disasters, transmit the emotional weight of narratives of oppression, and clarify moral truths. The exhibition questions how we find our bearings, how do we find truth in poetry, prose, and reportage when they all exist on the same groundless plane, when we may all be descending together in freefall.

“This exhibition provides a timely opportunity for critical reflection on our collective relationship to mass media, truth, and fiction,” said VPAM Director Pilar Tompkins Rivas. “York’s practice offers an original take on the complexities of this tension through aesthetics.”
Exhibition Highlights

The sculpture Freefall (2019), is a collapsed balcony, ripped from its architectural context, proposing a state of perpetual falling. The work references the loss of one’s bearings, or the absence of a common belief in a collective social horizon line. In the present moment, where political, cultural, and entertainment spheres are often consumed and collapsed into the same digital plane, the work signals the lack of a basic societal consensus on what is up and what is down.

Forensic IV (2019) explores how groups of images can produce meaning in relationship to each other, and in ways that are similar to how words and language function. In the absence of an explanatory text, people often search for patterns and categories that can bridge the gap between the images to create narratives of their own. In this work, Chang presents an erased index of images which complicates the viewers’ drive to construct such meanings. Here, the artist has taken obsolete Polaroid film, mechanical photographic devices solely designed for the production of instant, chemically produced images, and has reversed them. By flipping 285 Polaroid images, and actively denying access to them, he denies the immediacy of the image while paradoxically underscoring the necessity and power of the image itself. Viewers are left to sort through what remains in the gaps between and behind the images, and what they project onto that void.

Throughout the gallery space, Factographic Fields (2019) covers the floor in a dynamic installation. Factography is a concept coined by the Soviet avant-garde to describe the aesthetic practice of embedding facts within storytelling to create a greater collective truth. The term is applied here to describe the visual ordering of photojournalistic images. In this work, Chang grapples with finding himself in a new age of propaganda, a time when there are no coincidences, only anonymous algorithms driving systems and networks of diverse images into our consciousness in an immersive, perpetual visual campaign. These images cast auras on each other to the point of illegibility, functioning as a montage in space but without time or directional constraints. The artist’s factographs, published at one of the last newspaper offset printing presses in Los Angeles, give a material, analog sense of the volume of images consumed every day in the digital world.

About the artist

Trained as both a lawyer and an artist, York Chang’s (b. 1973, St. Louis, MO) visual art practice employs strategies of collage, décollage, redaction and interlineation as interventions into information systems, often appropriating legal contracts, books, archives, documentary films, and newspapers for use as material in his projects. Chang’s work is concurrently on view in a solo exhibition at the Orange County Museum of Art (OCMA), and he has exhibited his work at Commonwealth & Council, Greene Exhibitions, Samuel Freeman Gallery, Charlie James Gallery, 18th Street Arts Center, LACE, MAK Center for Art & Architecture, MassMOCA, and Edel Assanti in London. He is a 2014 California Community Foundation Fellowship Grantee, and a 2011 18th Street Arts Center Artist Fellowship Grantee.
